Read the following text and answer the questions below.

If you keep your eyes open, you'll learn a lot about the English during your first morning in the country. You'll see the milkman taking milk to people's houses, the baker taking bread, and the newspaper boys and girls delivering newspapers. If you join a bus queue, you'll see how the English are at queuing-how they wait in line, one behind the other, talking about the weather ("terrible weather we're having!") "Yes, unbelievable, isn't it?) and preparing the exact amount of money to give to the driver. When the bus comes, go upstairs and you'll see that it's the buses and cars that have to stop at the zebra crossings –not the pedestrians. You'll probably see a lollipop lady stopping the traffic and helping the schoolchildren across the road. You'll see lots of parks, play areas, public libraries, public toilets, more bus queues, hundreds of litter bins, more toilets... And even if you travelled all day, you probably wouldn't see a car double-parked and you certainly wouldn't see a policeman with a gun.

The adjectives that probably occur to you during your first morning are: well-organized, efficient, and civilized. And there's a good reason for this. England is one of the most densely-populated countries in the world (52 million people in 130,000 square kilometers – compared with, say, Spain's 40 million in 50,000 square kilometers). If the population hadn't increased so rapidly after the Industrial Revolution, England would have developed very differently. With so many people in so little space, however, community life would be impossible if it wasn't carefully planned: the English are well-organized because they have to be well-organized. The high population density also causes problems, of course, as you will see later in your stay....
